A frequent stylistic feature of totempole design is the sculptural expansion of the major shapes which are, in turn, separated one from the other (PL 3, c). Within these major divisions there is further segmentation of details. The major and minor forms are both usually represented by deep relief carving in which a varied angling of planes in respect to the surface plane is of conspicuous importance. Other parts are divided by incised surface lines and by painted areas. The importance in the design of separated areas is evident in every case. An exaggeration in the rendering of heads, whether human, animal, or composite, is fundamental to pole design (Fig. 10). In practically every example these are arranged in a vertical, rhythmical pattern. This is a repetitious pattern often broken by smaller design elements. Within the over-all design these repetitious elements are often alternating and are composed of a number of varied shapes. Rhythmic relationships are usually vertically oriented and are seldom obvious. The heavily accented parts are of extreme importance in these designs. While they practically always carry the balanced and rhythmical elements, they also function in the design because of their sculptural prominence. The rendering of these distinctive parts often places a totem pole within a broad traditional area and sometimes within specific tribal limits. The rhythmic handling of...
