Not illustrated. 1855 Excerpt: . a question which we have not at present the means of solving. Homer, or the earliest transcribers of his poems, only used the twenty letters above named; and it is evidently an after-thought of his critics, and not his own, that his poem is divided into twenty-four books, to celebrate the twenty-four letters of the new Greek alphabet, since he only knew twenty. The subsequent addition of the last four Z, H, Y, and Q, may probably belong to a period when the Greek letters had assumed their final form, as they have not yet, being discovered among the letters of the ancient Pelasgio-Phoenicio characters. If Simonides, of Ceos, was the first to make use of these new characters, their introduction may date about 500 to 520 B.C.; but these are details which there is not room to discuss fully in the present volume. It...
